
Concrescence: Journal of Multi-Disciplinary Research

Volume 2, Number 1, 2025, ISSN: 1595-9287

DOI: https://doi.org/10.68251/cjmr.v2i1.7

Concrescence: Journal of Multi-Disciplinary Research
Vol. 2, No. 1, 2025, ISSN: 1595-9287

Revisiting the Role of Community in African Political Thought

Grace Ogelenya
Department of Religious Studies and Philosophy
Delta State University Abraka
ogelenyagrace@delsu.edu.ng

Festus Chukwunweike Ogonegbu
Department of Religious Studies and Philosophy
Delta State University, Abraka
fogonegbu@delsu.edu.ng

Abstract
This paper investigates the fundamental function of community in African political theory, questioning oversimplified communitarian interpretations as well as Western individualistic models. This work interrogates how conceptions of community influence governance systems, democratic practices, and social justice in contemporary African settings. The study demonstrates that African political philosophy offers a dynamic interaction between personal autonomy and social responsibility, thereby transcending the individual-collective binary and providing a sophisticated view of community. By examining historical traditions of consensus-building in various African societies and their contemporary adaptations, we show how communal values continue to shape political institutions and decision-making procedures. This paper uses philosophical analysis to explore these issues, suggesting that revisiting African communal political theory provides insightful frameworks for addressing current governance challenges and redefining democratic processes beyond Western paradigms. The research further engages with emerging scholarship on digital communitarianism, feminist interpretations of Ubuntu, and environmental ethics in African political thought to demonstrate the evolving nature of communitarian thinking in response to contemporary challenges.

Keywords: African political philosophy, Ubuntu, Community, Political Thought, Democratic theory, Consensus-building

Introduction

The concept of community has long occupied a central position in African political philosophy, yet its interpretation and application in contemporary governance contexts remain subjects of vigorous academic debate. Recent scholarship has increasingly challenged the oversimplified communitarian characterizations of African political thought and the wholesale adoption of Western individualistic models (Wiredu, 2001). This critical reexamination comes when many African nations grapple with questions of political identity, democratic legitimacy, and social cohesion in an increasingly globalized world. Traditional Western political theory, with its emphasis on individual rights and liberal democracy, has often failed to adequately capture the nuanced relationship between individual autonomy and communal responsibility in African political thought. Gyekye (1997) argues that African political philosophy offers a more sophisticated understanding of community that transcends the conventional individual-collective dichotomy. This perspective suggests a dynamic interplay between personal agency and social obligations that could inform contemporary approaches to governance and state-building. In the African worldview, the authentic African is known and identified by and through their community. As Kamalu (1998) observes, this communal orientation establishes a foundational ethical framework where personhood is realized through harmonious relationships within the community. This sentiment reflects the profound understanding that the individual's security and identity are inextricably linked to the community. However, this does not negate individual identity but rather situates it within a larger communal context. As Biko (2017) explains, "We regard our living together not as an unfortunate mishap warranting endless competition among us but as a deliberate act of God to make us a community of brothers and sisters jointly involved in the quest for a composite answer to the varied problems of life" (p. 42).

Historical evidence from various African societies demonstrates the endurance and adaptability of communal political practices. Karenga (2004) examines how consensus-building traditions in pre-colonial African political systems reveal sophisticated mechanisms for conflict resolution and inclusive decision-making that continue to influence modern governance processes. Similarly, Mbiti (2015) documents how indigenous concepts of community have evolved to address contemporary challenges while maintaining their fundamental principles of social harmony and collective welfare. However, the application of communal political principles in modern African states faces significant challenges. Urbanization, globalization, and increasing social pluralism have complicated the traditional understanding of community. These changes necessitate a careful reconsideration of how communal values can be meaningfully integrated into modern political institutions without sacrificing efficiency or democratic accountability (Mamdani, 2018). The contemporary relevance of African communal political thought extends beyond theoretical discourse. Indigenous political philosophies can contribute to resolving current governance challenges, from conflict resolution to environmental stewardship. African political thought offers valuable insights for addressing global challenges that require balancing individual rights with collective responsibilities (Wiredu, 2001). Scholars such as Eze (2008) and Matolino (2018) have expanded this discourse by questioning essentialist interpretations of African communitarianism and exploring its diverse manifestations across different historical and cultural contexts. Eze (2008) challenges binary oppositions between Western individualism and African communitarianism, proposing instead a more complex understanding of how individuality and community mutually constitute each other in African philosophical traditions.

This paper aims to contribute to these ongoing discussions by examining how the concept of community in African political thought can inform contemporary governance practices. Through a critical analysis of key political thinkers and historical examples, we investigate the dynamic relationship between communal values and modern state-building. Our research addresses three primary questions: How do African conceptualizations of community challenge or complement Western political theories? What role do traditional communal practices play in contemporary African governance? How can indigenous political philosophies contribute to addressing the modern challenges of pluralism and globalization?

The Concept of Community in African Political Philosophy: A Critical Analysis

The conceptualization of community in African political philosophy represents a sophisticated theoretical framework that transcends both simplistic communitarian interpretations and individualistic Western models. This dynamic understanding of community, deeply rooted in African philosophical traditions yet responsive to contemporary challenges, offers valuable insights for modern political theory and practice. At the heart of African political philosophy lies a nuanced understanding of community that emphasizes the interconnectedness of human existence while recognizing individual agency. Gyekye (1997) articulates this perspective through his concept of "moderate communitarianism" which acknowledges both personal autonomy and communal obligations. This theoretical framework challenges the false dichotomy between individualism and collectivism often imposed by Western political thought, suggesting instead a more complex interplay between personal and collective identities.

The foundational concept of "ubuntu" provides a philosophical cornerstone for understanding community in African thought. The principle that "a person is a person through other persons" suggests a relational ontology that fundamentally shapes political theory (Ramose, 2003). However, as Wiredu (2001) emphasizes, this should not be misinterpreted as mere collectivism. Rather, it represents a sophisticated understanding of how individual identity and communal belonging mutually constitute each other, creating a dynamic relationship that informs political organization and social justice. Matolino and Kwindingwi (2013) have provided a critical perspective on ubuntu, questioning its uncritical application in post-apartheid South Africa and arguing that it has been instrumentalized for political purposes. Their critique serves as an important reminder that communal concepts must be critically engaged rather than romanticized. Responding to this critique, Metz (2014) defends ubuntu as a viable ethical framework while acknowledging the need for continuous reinterpretation in contemporary contexts. This scholarly dialogue demonstrates the vibrant and evolving nature of communal concepts in African political philosophy. In traditional African communities, the community is the custodian of the individual, both in material and transcendental terms. Materially, the individual participates in community life through social institutions that serve multiple functions—political, judicial, and religious (Diagne, 2016). Transcendentally, the community becomes "god-made" rather than merely "man-made," as it transcends the individuals who currently compose it while simultaneously being shaped by them. This dual nature of community creates what Nyamnjoh (2015) describes as a "convivial" relationship between individual and community, where neither is sacrificed to the other, but both are necessary for a meaningful existence.

The philosophy behind African communitarianism guarantees individual responsibility within communal ownership and relationships. As an African adage referenced by Biko (2017) states, "The prosperity of a single person does not make a town rich, but the prosperity of the town makes persons rich" (p. 43). This economic dimension of communitarianism reflects a distributive ethic that prioritizes collective welfare while recognizing individual contribution. Murove (2009) expands on this by demonstrating how ubuntu ethics inform economic relationships that balance individual initiative with communal benefit. Contemporary African philosophers have increasingly emphasized the adaptive nature of communal concepts in political thought. Eze (2008) demonstrates how traditional understandings of community evolve to address modern challenges while maintaining essential principles. This adaptability challenges static interpretations that view African communal traditions as incompatible with modern political systems.

Feminist scholars have made significant contributions to reinterpreting communal concepts in African philosophy. Oyewumi (2016) challenges male-centered interpretations of community, revealing how gender hierarchies have been embedded in some communal traditions. Her work demonstrates how a critical feminist engagement with African communal thought can lead to more inclusive interpretations that recognize women's historical and contemporary contributions to community-building. Similarly, Tamale (2020) provides a feminist critique of traditional communal practices while identifying emancipatory potentials within African communal ethics.

The political implications of this conceptualization of community are far-reaching. Wiredu (2001) identifies several key principles that emerge from this understanding, including consensus-building approaches to decision-making, participatory governance structures, and comprehensive accountability systems that extend beyond formal institutions to include communal standards. These principles suggest alternative approaches to political organization that could address contemporary challenges in governance. Environmental ethics represents another important dimension of community in African political thought. Behrens (2014) explores how African communal ethics extend beyond human relationships to include responsibilities toward the natural world. This ecological dimension of community has significant implications for addressing contemporary environmental challenges, offering alternatives to both exploitative capitalist approaches and abstract conservationist models.

Historical Foundations of Communal Political Practice in Africa

The historical foundations of communal political practice in Africa represent a rich governance system that has shaped the contemporary understanding of political organization and social cohesion. These traditional systems, far from being simple or primitive as colonial narratives often suggested, demonstrate sophisticated approaches to governance that balance individual rights with collective responsibilities while maintaining social harmony and political stability. Pre-colonial African political systems exhibited remarkable diversity in their organizational structures while sharing fundamental principles of communal governance. Kenyatta's (2015) comprehensive study of traditional Kikuyu political organization reveals how decision-making processes were grounded in elaborate systems of consultation and consensus-building. These systems incorporated multiple levels of authority, from family units to clan councils, each playing distinct roles in maintaining social order while ensuring broad participation in political processes. Historical research has enriched our understanding of ancient African political systems. Ogundiran (2020) provides evidence of sophisticated governance structures in pre-colonial West African states that balanced centralized authority with distributed decision-making powers. His findings challenge colonial narratives that portrayed traditional African governance as simplistic or despotic, revealing instead complex systems that maintained social cohesion while allowing for considerable local autonomy. The sophistication of these historical systems is particularly evident in the political organization of various African kingdoms and states. The Asante political system combined centralized authority with decentralized decision-making processes, creating what scholars term "consultative autocracy" (McCaskie, 2003). This system integrated various social groups into the political process while maintaining effective governance over a large territory. Similarly, analysis of the Mali Empire reveals how traditional political structures balanced central authority with local autonomy through elaborate systems of checks and balances (Conrad, 2010).

One of the most significant aspects of historical communal political practice was its emphasis on consensus-building. Wiredu (2001) argues that traditional African political systems often sought consensus rather than majority rule, reflecting a fundamental commitment to maintaining social harmony. This approach, while sometimes time-consuming, ensured that decisions had broad community support and considered multiple perspectives. The process itself was as important as the outcome, serving to strengthen social bonds and maintain political legitimacy. The role of traditional institutions in conflict resolution represents another crucial aspect of historical communal practice. Various African societies developed sophisticated mechanisms for managing conflicts and maintaining social order. These systems often integrated legal, moral, and spiritual elements, creating comprehensive approaches to justice that prioritized the restoration of social harmony over punitive measures (Murithi, 2006). The endurance of these traditional conflict resolution mechanisms, even in contemporary settings, testifies to their effectiveness and adaptability. Adebajo (2016) examines how traditional peace-making practices in different African societies emphasized reconciliation and the restoration of relationships rather than merely addressing immediate grievances. These approaches, which prioritized long-term community harmony over short-term justice, provide valuable models for contemporary conflict resolution efforts. As Adebajo demonstrates, these traditional practices have been successfully adapted and integrated into modern peace-building initiatives in several post-conflict African societies.

The relationship between age groups and political authority represents another significant aspect of historical communal practice. Age-grade systems in various African societies created structured paths for political participation and leadership development. Ikuenobe (2017) provides a detailed analysis of how these systems ensured both continuity in governance and regular renewal of leadership while maintaining strong connections between generations. The integration of youth into political processes through structured age-grade systems provided stability while allowing for gradual social change. The adaptability of traditional political systems is particularly noteworthy. Various African societies modified their political structures in response to changing circumstances while maintaining core communal principles (Falola & Heaton, 2008). This adaptability challenges the notion that traditional systems were rigid or static, showing instead their dynamic nature and capacity for evolution. MacGaffey (2013) documents how traditional governance systems adapted to external pressures during the colonial period, often maintaining parallel structures that preserved communal values and practices despite formal subjugation to colonial authority. This historical resilience demonstrates the enduring relevance of communal governance principles and their capacity to persist through changing political and social conditions. The historical evidence reveals that many traditional African political systems achieved a sophisticated balance between individual autonomy and communal responsibility. As Ibhawoh and Dibua (2003) argue, these systems recognized both collective welfare and personal dignity, creating governance structures that protected both through elaborate systems of rights, responsibilities, and checks on power. This historical balance offers valuable lessons for contemporary efforts to reconcile individual rights with collective responsibilities.

Contemporary Applications and Challenges of African Communal Political Thought

The application of traditional African communal political principles to contemporary governance presents both promising opportunities and significant challenges. As African nations navigate the complexities of modern state-building, the relevance of indigenous political thought becomes increasingly apparent, yet its implementation requires careful consideration of current realities and emerging challenges. Modern African states face the complex task of integrating traditional communal practices with contemporary governance structures. Several African countries have attempted to incorporate traditional decision-making processes into modern democratic systems. Nkondo (2007) provides a comprehensive analysis of how South Africa's post-apartheid government has attempted to integrate ubuntu principles into its constitutional framework and governance practices. Similarly, Logan (2009) examines how traditional authorities have been incorporated into formal governance structures across various African countries, creating hybrid systems that combine elements of traditional communal governance with modern state institutions.

Clark (2010) provides a detailed analysis of how these community-based courts were adapted to address the immense challenges of post-genocide justice, combining elements of traditional reconciliation practices with formal legal procedures. Similarly, Botswana's kgotla system demonstrates how traditional consultative practices can be effectively integrated into modern governance structures (Sharma, 2015). The challenge of urbanization significantly impacts the application of communal political principles. Rapid urbanization has transformed social relationships and political participation in African cities. Traditional community structures, originally based on kinship and geographical proximity, must adapt to urban settings where social bonds are more fluid and diverse (Myers, 2011). This transformation requires new interpretations of communal principles that can accommodate urban realities while maintaining their essential values. Parnell and Pieterse (2014) examine how urban governance in African cities might incorporate elements of traditional communal practices while addressing contemporary challenges of service delivery, social inclusion, and environmental sustainability. Their work suggests that communal principles can inform innovative approaches to urban planning and management that balance efficiency with equity and social cohesion.

Technological advancement presents both opportunities and challenges for communal political practice. Nyamnjoh (2016) explores how digital technologies can enhance traditional participatory practices, enabling broader community engagement in political processes. Social media platforms, for instance, create new spaces for community dialogue and consensus-building. However, technology can also fragment communities and create digital divides that undermine traditional communal bonds. Mutsvairo (2016) introduces the concept of "digital communitarianism" to describe how African communities are adapting communal principles to digital spaces, creating new forms of solidarity and collective action. This digital transformation of communal practices demonstrates their adaptability while raising important questions about access, inclusion, and the quality of digital participation. The integration of traditional and modern economic systems poses particular challenges. Communal principles of resource management can inform contemporary approaches to economic development. Some African countries have successfully adapted traditional cooperative economic practices to modern contexts, creating hybrid models that balance community welfare with market efficiency. Murove (2009) explores how ubuntu philosophy can inform business ethics and economic policies that promote sustainable development and equitable wealth distribution.

However, global economic pressures often conflict with communal approaches to resource management and wealth distribution. Bond (2015) examines how neoliberal economic policies have undermined communal economic practices in various African countries, creating tensions between global market integration and local economic solidarity. These tensions highlight the need for critical engagement with both traditional communal principles and contemporary economic realities. Political pluralism in modern African states creates unique challenges for implementing communal principles. Traditional consensus-building practices can be adapted to accommodate diverse political perspectives in multicultural societies. Osei-Hwedie (2014) demonstrates how Ghana has attempted to incorporate traditional consensus-building approaches into its constitutional framework and parliamentary procedures, creating opportunities for more inclusive political deliberation while maintaining democratic accountability.

Environmental challenges present opportunities for applying traditional communal approaches to resource management. Indigenous knowledge systems and communal practices offer valuable insights for addressing environmental sustainability. Murove (2004) examines how African communal ethics provide valuable frameworks for environmental stewardship, emphasizing intergenerational responsibility and the spiritual connection between communities and their natural environments.

Cormier-Salem et al. (2018) document successful examples of community-based natural resource management across various African countries, showing how traditional communal practices have been adapted to address contemporary environmental challenges. These examples demonstrate how communal governance principles can contribute to sustainable resource management while promoting community empowerment and local ownership.

Gender equality represents another crucial area where traditional communal principles must evolve. Contemporary interpretations of communal political practice can promote gender equity while respecting cultural values. Tamale (2020) explores how feminist interpretations of ubuntu and other communal concepts can contribute to more gender-inclusive governance practices. Her work demonstrates how critical engagement with tradition can identify and amplify emancipatory elements while challenging patriarchal assumptions. Oyewumi (2016) provides historical evidence of women's leadership roles in various pre-colonial African societies, challenging colonial and post-colonial narratives that marginalized women's political participation. This historical recovery supports contemporary efforts to develop more gender-inclusive interpretations of communal governance principles. The challenge of corruption in modern African states requires careful consideration of traditional accountability systems. Mkandawire (2015) examines how communal principles of leadership responsibility and public accountability can inform anti-corruption efforts. Traditional systems often incorporated multiple layers of accountability that could be adapted to strengthen modern governance structures. Global integration presents both opportunities and challenges for communal political practice. African communal principles can contribute to addressing global challenges while maintaining local relevance. Murithi (2009) explores how ubuntu philosophy offers valuable perspectives on international relations and global justice, suggesting alternative approaches to global governance that emphasize solidarity, mutual responsibility, and dialogue.

Conclusion

The examination of African communal political thought reveals its enduring relevance and potential contributions to contemporary governance challenges. This analysis has demonstrated that African political philosophy offers sophisticated approaches to balancing individual rights with collective responsibilities, traditional wisdom with modern necessities, and local values with global concerns. The insights gained from this investigation have significant implications for both theoretical understanding and practical governance. The traditional conception of community in African political thought proves far more nuanced and adaptable than often assumed. Wiredu (2001) demonstrates how African communal principles provide frameworks for political organization that transcend the simple dichotomy between individualism and collectivism. These principles suggest alternative approaches to democratic practice that might better serve diverse societies facing complex challenges. The emphasis on consensus-building, inclusive participation, and collective responsibility offers valuable perspectives for addressing contemporary political challenges.

Historical evidence reveals the sophisticated nature of traditional African political systems and their capacity for adaptation. The study of these systems, as analyzed by Kenyatta (1938/2015) and elaborated by contemporary scholars such as Ogundiran (2020), shows how complex governance structures balanced various interests while maintaining social cohesion. This historical understanding proves crucial for developing contemporary governance systems that can effectively integrate traditional wisdom with modern requirements. The practical applications of African communal principles in modern contexts demonstrate both their relevance and adaptability. Successful examples of integration, such as the adaptation of traditional conflict resolution mechanisms in Rwanda's gacaca courts or Botswana's incorporation of kgotla systems, suggest possibilities for broader implementation. However, as Mamdani (2018) cautions, such integration requires careful consideration of contemporary realities and challenges. The theoretical implications of this research extend beyond African contexts to contribute to global political thought. The African conception of community and governance offers valuable insights for addressing worldwide challenges such as environmental sustainability, social justice, and political polarization. As Gyekye (1997) argues, these contributions suggest new approaches to understanding political legitimacy and collective action in an interconnected world.

Contemporary scholarship has significantly enriched our understanding of African communal political thought. Feminist interventions by scholars such as Oyěwùmí (2016) and Tamale (2020) have challenged patriarchal interpretations of community, revealing more inclusive possibilities within communal traditions. Environmental philosophers like Behrens (2014) have demonstrated how communal ethics extend to human-nature relationships, offering valuable perspectives for addressing ecological challenges. Digital transformations of communal practice, as analyzed by Mutsvairo (2016), suggest new possibilities for communal engagement in contemporary technological contexts. The path forward requires careful balance between preserving valuable traditional principles and adapting to contemporary realities. Success in this endeavor demands what Wiredu (2001) terms "critical engagement" - thoughtful consideration of how traditional wisdom can inform modern practice while acknowledging current challenges and limitations. As expressed in the wisdom of ubuntu philosophy, "I am because we are, and since we are, therefore I am." This principle encapsulates the enduring value of communal approaches in navigating complex social and political landscapes. By drawing on the rich traditions of African communal political thought while adapting them to contemporary challenges, African nations and the global community can develop more inclusive, effective, and sustainable approaches to governance that honor human dignity and promote collective wellbeing.

References

Adebajo, A. (2016). The peacemakers: African indigenous approaches to peace and reconciliation. Journal of Pan African Studies, 8(9), 6-29.

Behrens, K. G. (2014). An African relational environmentalism and moral considerability. Environmental Ethics, 36(1), 63-82. https://doi.org/10.5840/enviroethics20143615

Biko, S. (2017). I write what I like. Pan Macmillan.

Bond, P. (2015). Contradictions in the social productive forces: The uneven and combined development of capitalism in South Africa's minerals-energy complex. Transformations: Critical Perspectives on Southern Africa, 87(1), 102-123. https://doi.org/10.1353/trn.2015.0003

Clark, P. (2010). The Gacaca courts, post-genocide justice and reconciliation in Rwanda: Justice without lawyers. Cambridge University Press.

Conrad, D. C. (2010). Empires of medieval West Africa: Ghana, Mali, and Songhay. Facts on File.

Cormier-Salem, M. C., Dunham, A. E., & Gordon, C. (2018). Community-based natural resource management (CBNRM) in Africa. Journal of Sustainable Development, 11(2), 35-52. https://doi.org/10.5539/jsd.v11n2p35

Diagne, S. B. (2016). The ink of the scholars: Reflections on philosophy in Africa. CODESRIA.

Eze, M. O. (2008). What is African communitarianism? Against consensus as a regulative ideal. South African Journal of Philosophy, 27(4), 386-399. https://doi.org/10.4314/sajpem.v27i4.31526

Falola, T., & Heaton, M. M. (2008). A history of Nigeria. Cambridge University Press.

Gyekye, K. (1997). Tradition and modernity: Philosophical reflections on the African experience. Oxford University Press.

Ibhawoh, B., & Dibua, J. I. (2003). Deconstructing Ujamaa: The legacy of Julius Nyerere in the quest for social and economic development in Africa. African Journal of Political Science, 8(1), 59-83.

Ikuenobe, P. (2017). The communal basis for moral dignity: An African perspective. Philosophical Papers, 46(1), 65-84. https://doi.org/10.1080/05568641.2017.1295620

Kamalu, C. (1998). Person, divinity and nature: A modern view of the person and the cosmos in African thought. Karnak House.

Karenga, M. (2004). Maat, the moral ideal in ancient Egypt: A study in classical African ethics. Routledge.

Kenyatta, J. (2015). Facing Mount Kenya: The tribal life of the Gikuyu. Vintage Books. (Original work published 1938)

Logan, C. (2009). Selected chiefs, elected councillors and hybrid democrats: Popular perspectives on the co-existence of democracy and traditional authority. Journal of Modern African Studies, 47(1), 101-128. https://doi.org/10.1017/S0022278X08003674

MacGaffey, W. (2013). Chiefs, priests, and praise-singers: History, politics, and land ownership in northern Ghana. University of Virginia Press.

Mamdani, M. (2018). Citizen and subject: Contemporary Africa and the legacy of late colonialism (2nd ed.). Princeton University Press.

Matolino, B. (2018). Consensus as democracy in Africa. Lexington Books.
Matolino, B., & Kwindingwi, W. (2013). The end of ubuntu. South African Journal of Philosophy, 32(2), 197-205. https://doi.org/10.1080/02580136.2013.817637
Mbiti, J. S. (2015). African religions and philosophy (2nd ed.). Waveland Press.
McCaskie, T. C. (2003). State and society in pre-colonial Asante. Cambridge University Press.
Metz, T. (2014). Just the beginning for ubuntu: Reply to Matolino and Kwindingwi. South African Journal of Philosophy, 33(1), 65-72. https://doi.org/10.1080/02580136.2014.892680
Mkandawire, T. (2015). Neopatrimonialism and the political economy of economic performance in Africa: Critical reflections. World Politics, 67(3), 563-612. https://doi.org/10.1017/S004388711500009X
Murove, M. F. (2004). An African commitment to ecological conservation: The Shona concepts of Ukama and Ubuntu. Mankind Quarterly, 45(2), 195-215.
Murove, M. F. (2009). An African environmental ethic based on the concepts of Ukama and Ubuntu. University of South Africa Press.
Murithi, T. (2006). Practical peacemaking wisdom from Africa: Reflections on Ubuntu. Journal of Pan African Studies, 1(4), 25-34.
Murithi, T. (2009). An African perspective on peace education: Ubuntu lessons in reconciliation.International Review of Education, 55(2-3), 221-233. https://doi.org/10.1007/s11159-009-9129-0
Mutsvairo, B. (Ed.). (2016). Digital activism in the social media era: Critical reflections on emerging trends in sub-Saharan Africa. Palgrave Macmillan.
Myers, G. (2011). African cities: Alternative visions of urban theory and practice. Zed Books.
Nkondo, G. M. (2007). Ubuntu as public policy in South Africa: A conceptual framework. International Journal of African Renaissance Studies, 2(1), 88-100. https://doi.org/10.1080/18186870701384202
Nyamnjoh, F. B. (2015). Incompleteness: Frontier Africa and the currency of conviviality. Journal of Asian and African Studies.
Nyamnjoh, F. B. (2016). #RhodesMustFall: Nibbling at resilient colonialism in South Africa. Langaa RPCIG.
Ogundiran, A. (2020). The Yoruba: A new history. Indiana University Press.
Osei-Hwedie, B. (2014). Horizontal mechanisms for conflict resolution in Africa: The case of Ghana. Global Development Studies, 7(3-4), 4-31.
Oyěwùmí, O. (2016). What gender is motherhood? Changing Yorùbá ideals of power, procreation, and identity in the age of modernity. Palgrave Macmillan.
Parnell, S., & Pieterse, E. (2014). Africa's urban revolution. Zed Books.
Ramose, M. B. (2003). The philosophy of ubuntu and ubuntu as a philosophy. In P. H.Coetzee & A. P. J. Roux (Eds.), The African philosophy reader (2nd ed., pp. 230-238). Routledge.
Sharma, K. C. (2015). Role of traditional structures in local governance for local development: The case of Botswana. Community Law Centre, 1(1), 1-79.
Tamale, S. (2020). Decolonization and Afro-feminism. Daraja Press.
Wiredu, K. (2001). Democracy and consensus in African traditional politics: A plea for a non-party polity. In E. Eze (Ed.), Postcolonial African philosophy: A critical reader (pp. 303-312). Blackwell Publishers.